

The NAB has no right here. We, the American people, do have the right to use alternate forms of media, and XM provides an alternative form of media to traditional radio. Stopping XM from providing me with daily weather and traffic information, in a method infinitely more useful than traditional radio has ever been able to provide, would be a travesty and a grave injustice against the rights of American people. Not only would such an action thwart technological advancement but it also forces me, a consumer of information, to be subjected to the commercialism associated with traditional radio. Satellite radio is here and the FCC should encourage the direction it is moving in rather than help the NAB drag it down. Satellite radio providers enable parents to block channels that might have questionable material, and it's subscription requires credit card so adult supervision of its use is virtually mandatory.
